A Fair Lady Takes on "Maistre Allain"

Anne de Graville's Belle Dame sans mercy

DAISY DELOGU

Anne Malet de Graville, a well-educated noblewoman from a family of bibliophiles with close connections to the crown, served as a lady in waiting at the intimate and austere court of Queen Claude I of France. Claude cultivated the virtuous accomplishments of her ladies, and de Graville appears to have been a favored companion of the queen, for whom she composed two literary works, each based upon the work of a prestigious medieval master. One was a translation and adaptation of Boccaccio's epic romance, Teida, and the other, the focal point of the present article, a rewriting of La Belle Dame sans mercy (LBDSM), perhaps the best-known work of the so-called "père de l'éloquence française," the royal secretary, diplomat, and author, Alain Chartier.

Chartier composed LBDSM around 1424, at the court in exile of the beleaguered King Charles VII. The poem is a verse dialogue consisting of one hundred stanzas, of which the debate of a lady and her persistent would-be lover occupy seventy-two, framed and transmitted by an eavesdropping poet-narrator. The debate is characterized by the Lover's focus on his own suffering, and the Lady's refusal to engage him on the terms that he proposes. The poem concludes with the Lady's return to the dancing, a report of the Lover's death, and the narrator's words of caution to both lords and ladies. The former are to steer clear of the false lovers who give love a bad name, and the latter are enjoined not to be so cruel as the Lady, here identified as the belle dame sans mercy.

Almost immediately, the poem became the center of a literary quarrel, as readers took sides with one or the other of Chartier's protagonists, taking his open-ended conclusion as an invitation for further exploration of the positions on love and language articulated within the alternating huitains of LBDSM. Thus, the dialogue staged by LBDSM gave rise to numer-uous subsequent conversations. The poets inscribed in what Emma Cayley has called "collaborative debating communities" provided explanatory prequels to, and fictive courtroom dramas continuing, the saga of Chartier's Lady and Lover. In addition to the poems that restage the characters from Chartier's poem, other works written long after LBDSM, and not traditionally considered to form part of the so-called quarrel of LBDSM per se, continued to employ its structural features—that of an eavesdropping narrator for instance, or a dialogue between a lady and lover—or referred obliquely to some of its most famous verses (e.g., eyes are for looking), keeping Chartier's poem alive in literary memory long after its original composition and the attendant quarrel. In this way the quarrel of LBDSM can be seen to lead quite seamlessly into the so-called querelle des femmes, a prolonged interrogation of the qualities and value of women—and men—and their place in society.

In the present article I will argue that Anne de Graville's LBDSM may be read as a prise de position in this second, more long-lasting and also amorphous societal debate. First, I shall examine the dedicatory poem to Claude of France, next the formal and codicological features of de Graville's poem, and finally, some specific examples of her adaptation of Chartier's famous work. I demonstrate how Anne de Graville transformed a poem that had most often been used in the century following its composition to criticize the failure of its eponymous heroine to conform to the gender expectations for courtly women, into an affirmation of women's dignity, and the value of their contributions to court and literary culture.

Anne de Graville's dedicatory poem inscribes her work within a female literary and cultural realm. In formal terms, the dedicatory poem distinguishes itself both from Chartier's poem (written in octosyllabic huitains) and from de Graville's re-interpretation of this text (composed in decasyllabic rondeaux), and therefore stands apart from the rest of the manuscript, inviting a reading that takes into account these lyric models, while not permitting an assimilation of the dedicatory poem to either of them. The opening poem consists of 18 verses in rhyming decasyllabic couplets. It bears a dedication, "à ma dame," though the dedicatee is not named.

The author too is unnamed, but adjectival forms such as "excusée" (v. 6) permit us to identify the poet as a woman, while the presence of Anne de Graville's devise "En garde un levé," an anagram of her name, which appears at the bottom of the opening folio, serves as a signature and asserts de Graville's control over poem, text, and manuscript. Although the single manuscript that preserves de Graville's LBDSM, BnF, fr. 2253, is not illunated, the second work that she dedicated to Claude of France, her adaptation of Boccaccio's Teseida, contains a finely-executed frontispiece depicting author and patron, and including other women to the right and slightly in back of the queen, presumably other dames d'honneur and potential readers. One may imagine that de Graville envisioned an analogous public for her LBDSM.

Among the constellation of gender pairings that might characterize the poet-patron relationship, the most usual is one in which both parties are men. Of course, many women commissioned literary works—and, indeed, cultural patronage, such as that sponsored by Claude of France's mother Anne of Brittany, provided a means for women to exercise power—though most often from male writers. By offering her work to a woman, Anne de Graville may be seen to follow in the footsteps of Christine de Fizan, who dedicated a manuscript of the documents that formed part of the quarrel of the Roman de la Rose to Isabeau of Bavaria, queen of France, and later offered Isabeau the sumptuous manuscript London, British Library, Harley MS 4431, today known as the Queen's Manuscript. However, Anne de Graville had other models as well, and closer to hand.

De Graville's patron and dedicatee, Claude of France, belonged to a tradition of prestigious and culturally-vibrant female-centered courts. Her mother-in-law, Louise de Savoie, at whose court Claude spent many years, was remarkable for the education she afforded women. Indeed, Louise's daughter Marguerite (later queen of Navarre) would become a noted author in her own right. Following the death of her mother when she was seven, Louise de Savoie was herself raised at the court of Anne of France, whose Enseignements à sa fille (c. 1497–98, or 1503–05) provides intellectual, practical, and moral advice for her daughter, Suzanne of Bourbon. The courts of these powerful women were not just places of sociability, but also of cultural production and learning for the women raised and residing there.

Claude was no exception to this tradition. Noted for her piety, generosity, and concern for justice, Claude's court was a center where learning, good morals, and female virtue were actively cultivated. Claude's famous primer (Cambridge, Fitzwilliam MS 159) features an image of St. Anne teaching the young Virgin Mary to read, and another of Anne of Brittany kneeling before the reader bishop, St. Claudius of Besançon. Similarly, her Prayer Book features among its illuminations "avid readers and dozens of books" (Wilson-Chevalier 134). Kathleen Wilson-Chevalier recounts an anecdote from the early years of Claude's rule in which Francis I, wishing to show the royal library to a guest, but "chez sa femme" and clearly out of his element, could not find the keeper of the key to the library. This evidence of Claude’s bibliophiliac suggests that an original manuscript, a text composed in her honor, and one moreover that performs and promotes women’s virtue, would have constituted a pleasing gift for the queen.

Like the Lover of _LBDSM_, the lyric “I” of the dedicatory poem begs her lady to receive her affection and service. However, the poet of de Graville’s dedication provides a corrective to her model inasmuch as the service in question takes the form of writing rather than loving. Moreover, her poem will prove useful for her patron and the other ladies of her court because it will furnish an incitement to their virtue, rather than provoking grief and the loss of honor and reputation, like the love service that Chartier’s Lover enjoins the Lady to accept.

The dedicatory poem establishes not only de Graville’s relationship to her patron, but also to her predecessor. In her opening verses the author declares that “En maistre Allain de ses œuvres jay quis / A mon juger le plus fin et exquis.” These verses at once recognize the literary authority and prestige of “maistre Allain,” and also establish Anne de Graville as an authority in her own right, one familiar with the works of Chartier, and capable of determining which would make the most worthy gift to her patron. This relationship between past and present authors, in which Chartier’s prominence will be at once acknowledged and subordinated to de Graville’s, characterizes the poem: as a whole and the single manuscript witness in which it is preserved, BnF, fr. 2253.

De Graville’s decision to respond to an earlier and well-known work is characteristic of the poetic production of the time which, as Adrian Armstrong has argued, is a “collaborative social activity, involving co-operation and/or competition” (xiv). Poets engaged with one another’s works by continuing, adapting, or contesting them in texts that demonstrate homage and respect, as well as rivalry and one-upmanship. Within this dynamic poetic community, Chartier was a figure of exceptional importance, because the dialogism that particularly characterizes his works—and not exclusively _LBDSM_—inspired a vast amount of response and debate among his readers and successors (Armstrong xx-xxi). By engaging with an esteemed model in a manner consistent with the poetic mores of her era and milieu, de Graville is asserting her participation in and belonging to an exclusive group whose members possess and control a prestigious body of knowledge, and who are capable of imparting both poetic and ethical knowledge to their readers. Moreover, the dialogism so fundamental to Chartier’s works and to the poetic production that spanned his era and de Graville’s own is in ample evidence in her rewriting of _LBDSM_, which stages multiple and interconnecting dialogues, not least within the pages of the manuscript itself.

The single remarkable manuscript that preserves de Graville’s text likewise preserves Chartier’s poem—or at least, those portions of it which serve her literary objectives—in a visual staging of the interaction between poet and predecessor. On folio 3v (figure 1) we see a rubric, “L’amant,” written as a heading above the rondeau “Je seuffre mal.” In the margin in a much smaller script we see three _huitains_, corresponding to stanzas 25, 26, and 27 of Chartier’s poem. This _mise en page_ makes visible, indeed quite literal, the simultaneous citation and marginalization of Chartier that characterizes de Graville’s work. Chartier’s poem alternates, stanza by stanza, between the voices of Lady and Lover, with the exception of the stanzas that appear here. In his opening salvo to the Lady, the Lover is accorded three _huitains_, introducing a slight disequilibrium into their debate. De Graville condenses the Lover’s opening gambit into a single _rondeau_, thereby leveling the rhetorical playing field, as it were. In a kind of _reductio ad absurdum_, the Lover’s central claim of the poem is reduced to the four syllables of the refrain, “je seuffre mal.”

For a reader familiar with Chartier’s _LBDSM_, de Graville’s poem would appear to begin _in medias res_, because it suppresses the first 24 _huitains_ of Chartier's poem, and with them, the character of the poet-narrator. De Graville's reader is thus granted direct access to the claims and arguments of the Lover and the Lady, without the intervening presence and judgment of Chartier's narrator. Moreover, since the poet-narrator of LBDSM was often understood as a textual analog of Chartier himself, de Graville's suppression of this narrative presence is another way to sideline her predecessor. The excision of the narrator is completed in the following rondeau. While Chartier's huitain 28 was written from the perspective of the narrator, who reported the Lady's speech, de Graville's second rondeau is pronounced by the Lady herself, and indeed her presence and her control over her speech are conveyed by the refrain, "Je vous supply." The repetition of the first-person singular pronoun effected by the refrain highlights the Lady's presence and her ownership of her words, thoughts, and actions. From this point on, both Chartier and de Graville's speakers alternate in uniform lyric units until the end of the poem, from which, as we shall see presently, Chartier's auteur is likewise evacuated.

De Graville's choice of the rondeau as the form into which she transposes Chartier's text is not an innocent one. For Daniel Poiron the rondeau is inherently dialogic: "conçu pour l'échange, la rencontre, la communion," the rondeau performs the interchange between refrain and verses, sentence and gloss, Moi and les autres (Poiron 322, 333). Although de Graville's opening rondeau effects an abbreviatio of her predecessor, in general terms her poetic form also permits an amplificatio of each of Chartier's huitains. De Graville exhibits her poetic mastery by writing an especially complex form of the rondeau, called the rondeau double (Armstrong 176). Each consists of three decasyllabic stanzas of 5, 3, and 5 lines respectively. The second and third stanzas conclude with a refrain of four syllables which repeats the opening words of the first line of the rondeau. In addition to being longer than a huitain, the rondeau 's principle of organization is different. As its name indicates, the rondeau possesses a circularity that contrasts with the more linear tendency of the huitain. Chartier's huitains often develop a single idea, or use the two halves of the huitain to introduce a shift in perspective, or a new idea. De Graville's rondeaux provide three poetic units, while the refrain, which Theodore de Banville in a piquant metaphor calls "ces trois pointes d'acier," lends a focus to the rondeau that the huitain does not possess. The refrain can unify and reiterate, but it can also fragment or undermine meaning, sometimes functioning ironically as it is recontextualized over the course of the poem.

The rondeau possesses a capacity for irony or subversion that make it a particularly apt form in which to adapt the work of another.

The manuscript reproduces a huitain of Chartier's work alongside the corresponding rondeau by de Graville, as we see in figure 2. This layout makes possible (at least) two very different ways of engaging with de Graville's work. On the one hand, a reader can proceed linearly through de Graville's rondeaux, following her version of the debate between the Lover and Lady. On the other hand, the presence of Chartier's work in the margins also permits—indeed it practically demands—a direct comparison of Chartier's work to de Graville's. The reader is invited to observe what de Graville has added, suppressed, changed, or moved with respect to her predecessor, and to interpret the significance of these transformations. In this manner, the dialogue between Lover and Lady is doubled by another—that between Chartier and de Graville. In Chartier's LBDSM, and in conformity with the conventions of courtly language and conduct, the Lover introduces and establishes the terms of the conversation, and consequently the conditions of possibility that define and delimit the parameters of the Lady's possible response. So, too, Chartier's poem provides the point of departure for de Graville's own. However, just as Chartier's Lady contests the signification and implications of her interlocutor's claims, likewise de Graville reinterprets Chartier's poem, introducing or emphasizing alternative perspectives and ideas. Furthermore, the juxtaposition of de Graville's and Chartier's works in the manuscript problematizes the very nature and possibility of dialogue. Who, in this manuscript, is speaking to whom? When voices speak side by side, in parallel, can we truly speak of exchange? Chartier's _LDMSM_ had itself constituted a kind of _dialogue des sourds_, in which the interlocutors frequently responded _à travers_, each bent upon the expression of his or her own perspective. De Graville's text, and especially the manuscript she designed for its transmission, offers new opportunities for communication.

In addition to the multiple possibilities for dialogue staged by the manuscript, de Graville's poem also invites dialogue between the text and its public, both the privileged and inscribed reader Claude, and the implied readers, the ladies of Claude's court who constitute yet another possible audience for the text. One can imagine a reader engaging in an exchange of perspectives with the text, and using the text as a starting point for conversation and debate among the women of Claude's court, a discussion about the possible meanings and implications of Chartier's and de Graville's works, not unlike the conversations that form an integral part of Marguerite de Navarre's _Héptaméron_. We see then that dialogue and exchange operate on a formal, semantic, and codicological level, that the text both performs and invites debate, reflection, interpretation, and continuation. As Bock and Zimmerman have remarked with respect to the _querelle des femmes_, "[t]he determining criterion [i.e., in deciding whether a text belongs or not to the _querelle_] is unquestionably the feature of querrelling, polemic, controversy, debate, verbal action and reaction" (140). From this standpoint, one may imagine de Graville's text not only as an intervention into the dynamic poetic circles of her day, but also in the _querelle des femmes_. It is to this aspect of the text, its _prise de position_ with respect to the qualities and conduct of men and women in society, that I would like now to turn.

One of the fundamental debates that animates Chartier's poem is that concerning language. The misuse of language and the failure of lovers to accord their words with their actions is one of the Lady's principal concerns, and the primary reason for her firm refusal of the Lover's advances. In addition, Lover and Lady contest the meaning and application of key terms, such as _courtoie_, _honneur_, and _pitié_. Such questions remain central to de Graville's poem, which preserves the general content and progression of Chartier's. On the level of individual _huitains_ and _rondeaux_, however, we are able to observe how de Graville shifts the emphasis that Chartier places on certain terms or concepts (35), expands upon his points (36), transforms aspects of his poem (51, 53), and innovates with respect to her original (50, 52). In order to elucidate these moments of textual transformation, I would like to examine and compare a series of stanzas (51–54) in which both poets explore the concept of _courtoie_.

Having refused to accord him the reception that, according to the Lover, love and _courtoie_ demand, Chartier's Lover declares at the midpoint of the poem that _courtoie_ is dead in the Lady: "sembleroit en vous perier / Courtoie, qui vous semoit / Qu'amouple soit par amours merci." In this accusation we see prefigured the Lady's eventual condemnation in the _quarrel_ of _LDMSM_, for the charges against her are of the gravest possible nature; she lacks the foremost quality that defines ladies—indeed all those of noble blood—and governs their conduct. This _huitain_ introduces a protracted discussion of _courtoie_, and subsequently of honor, but the Lover's denunciation of his beloved as a most uncourteous lady will stick.

De Graville effects important changes to the initial accusation, and to the whole sequence. Most significantly, her Lover does not declare that _courtoie_ is dead in his interlocutor. Instead, he affirms that "courtoie a m'aimer vous semoie / Quant je n'ai fait vers vous destoyauté" (emphasis added). Thus, _Courtoie_’s injunction to love stands, but not in the absolute sense in which it operated in Chartier’s poem, where love was the appropriate and only recompense for love. De Graville’s Lover does not leverage the idea of _courtoie_ to support a general principle, but: to advance his own objective: _courtoie_ enjoins you to love me, he says, when—and here we see another essential modification—I have not been disloyal. We observe the greater specificity of the love experience and the circumstances of the protagonists that characterizes de Graville’s poem, as well as the emphasis on personal ethics and responsibility that makes her _LDMSM_ a more didactic text than Chartier’s.

_Huitain_ 52, spoken by the Lady, opens with the line "Courtoie est si alicie / D’Onneur" and the corresponding _rondeau_ with "Courtoie est si amye et si chere / D’honnesteté." Thus "courtoie" becomes the refrain, thereby highlighting this key concept, and the elaboration of its meaning as developed by the Lady in de Graville’s poem not as a figure in whom _courtoie_ is dead, but rather one who possesses the authority to define this crucial term. Chartier’s “Onneur” becomes “honnesteté,” with its greater emphasis on good morals, and also appropriate behavior. De Graville conveys the sense of Chartier’s _huitain_ in her first two stanzas, and in her third she innovates, explaining that "De liberté emporte la bannière / Et toujours vist en franchise paniere / A servitude en rien elle ne ressemble / D’avec honneur jamais ne desassemble / Dont elle tient sa coutume premiere/Courtoie." De Graville emphasizes the freedom that is inseparable from honor, thereby affirming that women are not bound by men's desires, but that they have the liberty to choose a lover, or to eschew erotic love altogether.30

In the following huitain Chartier's Lover claims that "Donner le bien ou il defaut / Est courtoyse raisonnable," thus continuing to debate the significance and applications of this key term. De Graville, however, suppresses the word courtoyse entirely. Her Lover states that "Faire du bien a tous est de raison." In this manner, she allows her Lady's definition of courtoyse, as elaborated in the previous rondeau of that refrain, to stand uncontested. In huitain 54 Chartier's Lady picks up on the Lover's further definition of courtoyse, presented as "donner le bien ou il defaut," and opens with the assertion, "I don't know what you call 'good.' " De Graville's Lady, in contrast, knows perfectly well what the Lover is talking about, says as much, and denounces him and his lovers for their disingenuousness:

Ne scay que vous apelles 'bien' (Mal enprunte bien aultry non!)
Mais il est trop large du sien
Qui perd par donner son renom.

On ne doit faire otroy, si non Quant la requeste est advenant,
Car se l'honneur ne retenon,
Trop petit est le remenant.

Le le connois que vous appellez bien
Et mal assuy, puis j'apercoy fort bien
Que souvent a de vertu le nom Vers celles gens qui hayent qu'on leur dient 'non'

Vous desirez quelque chose du myen
Mais ceste la est trop large du sien
Qui par donner pert honnour et renom

Je le connois.
Si en donnant 'l'honneur je ne retien
Tout le surplus de mon bien ne vaut rien Nous ne devons voulir donner sy non Honneste don et que honnour retenon
Car luy sans plus est tout nostre entretien

Je le connois. (emphasis added)

We observe here a remarkable rewriting of Chartier, as his Lady's "I don't know" becomes de Graville's "I know," the phrase that constitutes the refrain no less, thus insisting on the Lady's knowledge and her positively affirmed first-person singular perspective, which in turn becomes the basis for a far more elaborate discourse on honor that expands upon what she had said in the rondeau "Courtisy." Chartier's Lady uses the terms "renon" and "honneur" once each in this huitain, while de Graville's Lady places a much greater emphasis on honor, especially in the third stanza in which she develops the importance of retaining one's honor, and links "honneur" to "honneste don"—that which a virtuous and respectable person might give or receive—as in the rondeau "courtisy."

This short series of stanzas illuminates in representative fashion the ways in which de Graville's poem, while giving the impression of fidelity to, and perhaps even rather pedestrian imitation of, her original, in fact assertively reorients Chartier's poem, contributing to a new definition of courtisy that suggests courtliness, as well as courtesy, an understanding that is informed by Italian cultural influences such as that exercised by Castiglione's Cortegiano.31 It also highlights another aspect of de Graville's rewriting to which we shall now turn, that is to say, the creation and inscription in her text of a community of female readers in which she participates.

As we have seen in the short series of stanzas just examined, the first-person singular voice of de Graville's Lady occupies a prominent position in her poem. Chartier's Lady of course employs the first-person singular as well, but as Mawny Bouchard and Catherine Müller have also noted, de Graville's poem tends to transform the impersonal universals of Chartier's poem, the "qui" and "Il," into specific individuals, the Lady and her would-be Lover. De Graville's use of first-person refrains—"je vous supply" (32), "je ne vous veux" (32), "je l'entends bien" (42), and of course "je le connois" (54), to name just a few—heightens our awareness of the perspective of her protagonist.

The forceful inscription of the female je in de Graville's poem makes possible the concomitant creation of a nous-women to whom and on behalf of whom the Lady speaks. Chartier's Lady had also spoken in broad terms about women. "Dames ne sont mie sio lourdes, / si mal entendans, ne sio folles" (vv. 397–98) for instance, or "les chetives qui s'i fient [in men's declarations of love] / En pleurent apres mainte larme" (vv. 351–52).32 However such statements speak of women in the third person plural, making an authoritative statement about their nature and experiences from which the speaker is distanced in grammatical and also affective terms. One might detect pity—perhaps even scorn?—in Chartier's Lady's reference to those "chetives," a group to which she, more savvy (or cynical) and less gullible, does not intend to belong. Thus there is little sense of female solidarity in Chartier’s poem. The only time that his Lady uses the first person plural is in her next to las: huitain, in which she makes her own conduct the basis for a general principle that all women would do well to respect: “Faux Semblant fait l’ombre et le doux / Pour bailler dames en aguet, / Et pour ce chacune de nous / Y doit bien l’escoute et le guet” (vv. 749–52, emphasis added). Women are thus to emulate the Lady, but one does not have the impression that she is one of them.

De Graville’s Lady, in contrast, has frequent recourse to a nous that seems to embrace author, female protagonist, patron, and female readers. In the rondeau “En tout honneur” (50), for example, the Lady says that women adapt their language to their interlocutors: “Selon les gens nous tenons le langage / Les estimans selon leur personne / Ung foul parlar scavons bailler aux folz / Aux importuns les fascher de courroux / Et aux aymez nous faisons avantage / En tout honneur.” Similarly in the rondeau “Je le connois” (54), as we have seen, “nous ne devons vouloir donner sy non / honnest de on.” In these examples the nous may refer to a community exclusively comprised of women, or to a community of all those who are honorable, reasonable, and who employ language appropriately.

In other rondeaux, the identity of the nous is more explicitly feminized. The rondeau “Sur tez mesfais” (74) addresses the misuse of language and in particular those who brag about the favors they (claim to) have received from women. The Lover calls such a boaster a “fol ingrât” (r. “De tout honneur”); all well and good, except that, as the Lady points out, there is no court or judge in which such people or such acts are condemned. On the contrary, “seuffrent sur blasme vers nous courir.” The Lady goes on to lament that “Si nous prions replicuer ons est sourdu / Se ons nous fait tort aucun ne nous ressour / Nulz ou bien peu nous veulent secourir / Donc il convient gref reprochre encourir: / Pour le mal faict qui d’eux s’engendre et sourd.” We see a clear opposition here between the female community, nous, and the “on,” “aucun,” “nulz,” “peu,” and “eux” by whom this nous is oppressed, slandered, and left victim of injustice that not only remains unredressed, but in fact is laid at their doorstep. Similarly, in the rondeau “De faire mal” (94), which corresponds to the huitain in which Chartier’s Lady had spoken of “chacune de nous,” de Graville presents her readers with the image of a vulnerable female community: “Faux semblant . . . est en aguet puis nostre auge d’enfance . . . pour nous tromper, mais chacune de nous / y doit le guet pour fouyr la mischance.” Faux Semblant, a figure made famous by the Roman de la Rose and here representat-

Delogu: A Fair Lady Takes on “Maistre Allain” 483
tive of the deceptive speech of men who seek to dishonor women, stalks women from their most tender youth. An oppositional, even adversarial, relationship pits men and women against one another, and since societal norms and institutions fail to protect women, it is incumbent upon them to watch out for themselves and one another.

The vivid presence of this community of women—of which the Lady is one—can be connected both to the dedicatory poem with its economy of female poet and patron, and to the courtly setting in which it would have been read and discussed. In evoking the very real dangers and pitfalls that beset women, the poem suggests that it might help its readers to navigate the perilous waters of the court, and most especially, to resist the insistent and alluring, but dangerous, sirèn call of love. In this way de Graville’s LBDSM serves as a didactic text by a woman, and for the benefit of other women. The idea that poem and poet might help others is enacted in the final rondeau, which stages another radical departure from its model.

Chartier’s LBDSM had ended with four huitains pronounced by the eavesdropping narrator of the opening frame (absent, as we have seen, from de Graville’s poem) which depicted the Lover taking leave of the Lady with a despairing apostrophe to Death (huitain 97), the reported death of the Lover and the Lady’s return to the dance (98), and two huitains of warning addressed to lovers and to ladies, respectively (99–100), concluding with the auteur’s baptism of the Lady as “sans mercy.” In contrast, de Graville omits entirely Chartier’s words of warning, and compresses his huitains 97 and 98 into a single rondeau by a figure identified as the acteur, who may or may not correspond to the “je” of the dedicatory poem. De Graville does preserve the Lover’s mental unhinging (he is “hors du sens”), as well as the Lady’s unconcern (“aucun deul n’en a pris sa maistresse”), but she interjects these, in the central stanza of the rondeau, an attempt at intervention into this dialogue on the part of the acteur: “Je luy vouluz lors estre secourant / Et tout soudain je vins vers luy courant / Mais je ne suez qu’il devint la presse / Ainsi partit.” De Graville’s poem, as we recall, is without a narrative frame, beginning with the lament of the Lover, and thus the acteur’s sudden appearance and interjection of her presence into the narrative setting represents a transgression of discursive and mimetic boundaries, as the author figure becomes a protagonist, albeit an unsuccessful one. Chartier’s words of warning, directed outward to his male and female readers, here become an attempt at rescue, directed inward towards the participants in the dialogue. This intervention suggests that the benevolent authority figure, the acteur and, implicitly, de Graville’s royal patron, have a moral responsibility towards those in her care. In addition, while Chartier holds his characters up as a cautionary tale, transforming them into literary exempla, de Graville turns her characters into people by suddenly inserting her acteur into a courtly setting and allowing this figure to interact with others, thereby suggesting how de Graville’s readers might apply the lessons and ideas of her poem to real-life circumstances.

The ethical and practical utility of de Graville’s poem brings us to the final point that I would like to make, namely the ways in which de Graville’s poem functions as a didactic text. Like the question of language, the issue and vocabulary of wisdom and folly run throughout Chartier’s text. However, de Graville’s insistence on this theme is far more pronounced than Chartier’s. First, and as others have noted, de Graville’s Lady quite consistently specifies that what she rejects is not love as such, but fol amour (Bouchard). Indeed, this phrase forms the refrain of rondeau 40. Accordingly, the word fol and its cognates appear with great frequency in de Graville, often added where the corresponding huitain had no such reference (e.g., 40, 50, 60, 67, 75, 94), and almost always in the rondeaux pronounced by the Lady.55

Alongside the vocabulary of folly or madness, from which de Graville’s Lady seeks to protect herself and, by implication, her female readers, there is also a discourse of learning, whether for good or for ill. The deceptive language of men, for instance, is not natural or inherent, but is a skill acquired in society, among and by means of other men. Women, not as gullible as men might wish, “scaivent bien que c’est que de frivolles / Et qu’en tenez les publicques escoles” (Quoy qu’en pensez). These verses correspond to Chartier’s huitain, but de Graville adds, “Chacun connoist que avez bons portocoles / De faictz parlers que estudiez par rolles / Comme meneurs qui n’ont les langues gouordes” (38). The “portocoles” and “rolles” that men study have legal and notarial connotations, suggesting that just as men go to school and study written texts in order to acquire knowledge of their eventual professions, and continue to employ reference documents to speak and write according to the norms of these professions, so too do they learn and impart to other men equally formulaic scripts of seduction.

However, prudent and virtuous conduct can also be learned. In the rondeau “En tous talz maulx” (66), the Lady insists to her interlocutor that his suffering, like his cure, are within his own control. Her vocabulary, “aprenes,” “retenez,” “aprendre,” highlights the idea that understanding, and consequently peace of mind, are the result of a process rather than an ontological or existential state, and one that he, moreover, can shape by adopting reasonable and ethical conduct. Perhaps the most illuminating rondeau from this perspective is “Ostez vous en” (82), in which the Lady tells the Lover that the more he hopes, the more he will be unhappy. However, she affirms that “si vous lisez aiseement apprendez / Oue espoir repais les chetifs et tendrez.” This is a near citation of Chartier’s parallel verse: “esperance paist les chetifz.” Reading can provide psychological and moral guidance, but not just any reading, rather that of Alain Chartier, that of poetry. The kind of reading the Lady recommends stands in pointed contrast to the “portocoles” and “rolles” used to teach men the immoral language of seduction and deception. Poetic texts—like that of Chartier, like that of de Graville—can and should be read by men and women alike in order to develop reason, the intellect, and moral understanding. De Graville’s poetic adaptation of Chartier is thus exemplary. It performs an engaged reading and productive interpretation of his text for the benefit of her public, which can thereby observe how thoughtful reading of poetic texts can teach both men and women to conduct themselves according to reason, avoiding fol amour, and preserving honneur and honnestété.

Anne de Graville’s LBDSM constitutes an insightful and powerful adaptation of Chartier’s original that asserts de Graville’s place among the poets of her era, with their emphasis on and appreciation for collaborative, sometimes combative or contestatory, adaptation and transformation of prestigious models. The manuscript that she created for her patron constitutes, as Emma Cayley has written with respect to the manuscripts of the Quarrel of LBDSM, a “space of play,” one in which poetic identities and content alike are claimed, challenged, and negotiated (161). BnF, fr. 2253 is a dynamic and richly dialogic space in which author, patron, predecessor, protagonists and public interact, (re)creating, adapting, and debating the significance of issues that resonated for Chartier’s public as much as for de Graville’s—the relationship between men and women, proper use of language, ethical conduct in society. The female community created in and by de Graville’s text has the capacity to transcend the space of the manuscript, and to shape the social community in which she lived, as well as those of her successors.

University of Chicago
Notes

6. Cayley defines "collaborative debating communities" in the introduction to Debate and Dialogue.

8. On the period between Chartier and de Graville, see Swift. An excellent mise au point of the querelle des femmes is provided by Bock and Zimmermann. As any attempt to define this expression and its referent makes clear, the querelle des femmes is difficult, if not impossible, to delimit in time or space, or in terms of the corpus of texts that constitute it. Are women the subjects or the objects of the quarrel? At the very least, I would argue for the continuity of this querelle with the modern feminist movement and studies of gender.

9. Wahlund's transcription is from BnF, fr. 2353. I have added punctuation and diacritical marks, and have turned t to u, and i to j, in accordance with modern editing conventions.

10. The image may be found in Boccaccio, Arsenal MS 516, fol. iv.

12. On the Queen's Manuscript, see http://www.pisan.lib.ubc.ca/ The gift of a manuscript conferred prestige upon donor and recipient alike, and the production and donation of a manuscript in the age of print awarded special status to the gift. As Cynthia Brown has shown, the advent of print transformed relationships between poets, patrons, and readers by liberating the poet of his or her dependence upon patronage and forging mercantile relationships, mediated by printers, directly between writers and a wider reading public. A luxury manuscript thus assumed more fully its role as privileged object destined for an individual, and forging a bond between poet and patron. See Poets, Patrons, and Printers: Crises of Authority in Late Medieval France (Ithaca and London: Cornell UP, 1995).

14. Though perhaps best known today for her production of the Heptameron, Marguerite de Navarre was also the author of religious and secular plays, devotional works, poetry, and numerous letters. See her Oeuvres complètes, under the direction of Nicole Cazauran (Paris: Champion, 2001–), 10 vols.

15. Anne of France, sometimes called Anne of Beaujeu (1461–1532), was the sister of Charles VIII (r. 1483–98) and sister-in-law of Anne of Brittany. After the death of Charles VIII in 1498, Anne of Brittany wed her husband's successor, Louis XII (r. 1498–1515), and from this union was born Claude of France.

16. Müller suggests that in the dedicatory poem, Claude occupies the position of Chartier's Lady ("Anne de Graville lectrice de 'Maistre Allain.' ").

17. See also Armstrong, "Alain Chartier and the Rhétoriqueurs."

19. See Helen Swift's excellent treatment of the querelle des femmes precisely in the period that interests us here. Swift emphasizes the importance of dialectic, performance, and a gender dynamics at work in the texts and social context of the queriel. Authors writing in this period demonstrate awareness "of their own materials as inherently intertextual with, we might say haunted by, prior texts, and their presentation of rhetorical action upon these texts as performative remakings of received material" (6).
20. The manuscript is not unusual in this respect. Swift notes that "[c]ontemporary poetic analogies, in both manuscript and print, juxtapose pro- and anti-feminine texts, indicating that a popular medieval habit of reading was dialectical, reading for and against, bouncing one off another" (147).

21. When referring to rondeaux or huitains by number instead of refrain, I use those that correspond to Chartier's poem. Consequently, de Graville's poem opens with rondeaux 25-27.

22. Much more could be said about the hierarchies established through visual means, both in terms of size of script and placement. On medieval margins as a contested territory and contested space, see Michael Camille, Image on the Edge: The Margins of Medieval Art (Cambridge: Harvard UP, 1991).

23. The rondeau is "plus et moins qu'un vers, car il joue dans l’ensemble du rondeau un rôle capital. Il en est à la fois le sujet, la raison d’être et le moyen d’expression. Car ce n’est que pour répéter trois fois ce mot persuasif ou cruel, ce n’est que pour lancer au même but l’une après l’autre ces trois pointes d’acier qu’on les ajoute au bout des strophes, qui sont à la fois le bois léger et les plumes aériennes du trio de flèches que représente le rondeau"; Théodore de Banville, Petit traité de poésie française, qtd. in de Montmorand, 125.

24. With the exception of Chartier's opening huitains, which, as we have seen, are compressed into one rondeau, and correspondingly in the margin, as seen in figure 1.

25. On folio 12r at the rondeau "Ong villain coeur," Chartier’s huitains 46 and 47 are both reproduced in the margin, such that from this point forward the corresponding huitain and rondeau no longer appear on the same page, but rather Chartier’s huitain precedes de Graville’s rondeau.

27. When citing Chartier’s text, I have used the edition of Huit and McRae.

29. For homnestet, http://www.atilif.fr/dmif gives "dignité, bienséance, convenance" also "conformité à la morale." For honneur, ‘principe d’action qui porte à une conduite dignes d’estime (moralement et socialement), dignité,” which, for women, is linked to chastity. Jean Nicot’s Le Thresor de la langue francaise (1606) gives for honneur “vient de ce Latin. honor, et en retient la signification: Mais il a esté usité aussi par les anciens pour la dignité qu’a le vassal d’estre fiéffé par un Roy ou grand Seigneur, et consequemment pour le fief meme duquel le vassal a esté par luy honorié.” For homnestet, the same source gives "honestas," while the Dictionnaire de l’Academie francaise, 1st edition (1694) gives "bienséance," "civilité" as well as "chasteté, pudeur, modestie." Cotgrave’s A Dictionarie of the French and English tongues (1611) gives for honneur ‘honour, renowne, reputation, credit, praise, glory, fame, great account, high reckoning, much estimation” also "an honourable estate, inheritance, or title, bestowed by a Prince, or a great lord." For homnestet: "honestie, vertue, goodnesse, integrité, tuth, sincerite, justesse, uprighnesse, humanite, courteisie, civilité, genlenses, worth, or worthiness." Thus we observe a greater sense of social convention and proper behavior in connection to homnestet, and for honneur a sense of connection to an office or official status.

30. Franchise can suggest fiscal freedom, and recalls also Chartier’s Lady’s famous line "Je suis france et France veul estre" (286), rendered in de Graville as "Franche naquis et par bonne ordonnance / France seray sans crainte ne doublance.”

31. Müller has argued that de Graville’s Lady does not denounce courtousie as such, but instead endeavors to recuperate this notion by educating the Lover in proper courtly behavior ("Anne de Graville lectrice de ‘Maistre Allain’"). Bouchard, in contrast, seeks to distinguish between a courtousie livresque, which does not correspond to lived reality, and a courtousie aulicie, which defines a viable position for women at court ("Les Belles [in] fidèles"). I tend to agree with Müller with respect to the Lady’s didactic efforts, but as stated above, I see these oriented around a purposeful and original understanding of courtousie that connects this concept to honneur and homnestet, thereby linking notions of Christian morality to ideas about appropriate behavior in order to propose a new sense of courtesy/courtliness.

33. With the connotation of a theatrical or fictional role.

34. Though of what, is not entirely clear; indeed, this ambiguity will drive the subsequent quarrel.

35. And here, I am not even including other rondeaux which employ synonyms of folie, such as sotte (32) or estourdie (34).

36. This relatively uncommon expression does not appear in Chartier’s LBDMS, where the corresponding verse reads: "Donst vous autres tenés escoles" (50). However, it does figure in huitain CLI of Villon’s Testament, in which the poet accords to two prostitutes, Marion l’Idolle and Jehanne de Bretaigne, the right to “tenir publice escole,” or establish a brothel. See François Villon, Œuvres complètes, ed. Jacqueline Cerquiglini-Toulet (Paris: Gallimard, 2014).

37. The http://www.atilif.fr/dmif gives “exemplaire d’un document, d’un ouvrage ... registre ... recueil de formules prescrites ... modèle,” Nizot gives “le registre des minutes ou primitifs originaires des contrats que les habitants rédigent en brief et par et cetera ... Protocole aussi est appelé le formulaire des lettres patentes ou closes que les Secrétaires du Roy, tant ceux des commandemens et d'estat, qu' autres dressent et peuuent . . . Ainsi appelle on Protocole de la chancellerie de France le livre qui contient tels formulaires de lettres. Protocole aussi est usité pour celuy qui porte le roollet par derriere et à l'espaceul d'un qui harange, ou joue en farces et moralités, pour les raddresser et remettre au fil de leur harenge ou roollet, quand ils variant ou demeurent courts . . . Ainsi dit on d'un qui a bonne memoire, il ne luy faut point de protocole" ; Cotgrave gives "the first draught, or copy of a deed, contract, instrument, evidence; or a short register kept thereof; also, a Precedent for the drawing of a patent, outside of such precedents; also, a promptor of one that makes an oration, or acts a part, in public" ; the Dictionnaire de l'Académie française, 1st edition (1694) also gives "formulaires pour dresser les actes publics." We observe thus both the meaning of a formulory, as well as the theatrical connotations of someone who supplies lines to an actor.

38. The http://www.atilf.fr/dmf gives "oueule de parchemin ou de papiere sur lequel on dresse un inventaire, une liste, en constituant ainsi un registre ... un registre de comptes ... d'une imposition ... d'une revue d'hommes d'armes" as well as "écrit contenant ce que l'on a à réciter dans une pièce de théâtre." Cotgrave gives "a list, inventories, catalogue, bill, scrowle, registre, of names, of causes." The Dictionnaire de l'Académie française, 1st edition (1694) gives "une ou plusieurs feuilles de papier, de parchemin, collées bout à bout, sur que on écrivoit des actes, des titres." "ce que doit reçier un Acteur dans une piece de theatre," "le Personnage representé par l'Acteur," and "De tous ceux qui disent et qui font tout ce qu'il leur convient de dire et de faire pour leurs vues particulieres."

39. Here, Cayley argues that rewritings are part of a poetic game in which "each successive poet both inscribes himself in an existing space of play (field), and struggles to dominate that field" (161).

Works Cited

Armstrong, Adrian. The Virtuoso Circle: Competition, Collaboration, and Complexity in

Bock, Gisela, and Margarete Zimmermann. "The European Querelle des femmes," Dispu-tatio: an international transdisciplinary journal of the late Middle Ages 5 (2002):
127–56.

Cayley, Emma. Debate and Dialogue: Alain Chartier in His Cultural Context. Oxford:

Chartier, Alain. Baudet Herenc, and Achille Caulier. Le Cycle de La Belle Dame Sans Mercy: Une anthologie poétique du XVe siècle (BNF MS Fr. 1191). Ed. and trans.

A Companion to Alain Chartier (c. 1385-1439), Father of French Elegance. Ed. Daisy